First Element

All entry-level polygraphs include questions about drug use. Such questions have been asked for many years, though without extensive research, we are unable to determine precisely when the practice began. In addition, all entry-level medical examinations include urine analysis for drug use. Since January 1986, all applicants without exception have undertaken both medical and polygraph tests for drug use..

Second Element

All new employees are subject to reinvestigation between three and five years after initial employment. This reinvestigation consists of an updated background investigation and a reinvestigation polygraph. This polygraph includes questions about drug use. In addition, if the results of the background investigation suggest possible drug use, additional medical testing as a complement to the polygraph may be required.

Third Element

After completion of the reinvestigation described in the second element, employees are investigated approximately every five years for the rest of their term of employment. This investigation includes an update of their background investigation. If this investigation develops indicators of drug use, polygraph testing and, perhaps, medical testing for drug use are generally required.
